

Golden yarn, so fine and bright,
Straw turned silk by candlelight.
Spun by hands both swift and wise,
Find it where the spindle lies.

Tooth of Yeti, Sharp and white
Claimed from beast with bitter bite
Far from home, on windy peaks
Lies the wintry beast you seek

Bone of a dead man, cold as frost,
Jarghydh lives though life is lost.
A mage of wisdom, he lies unseen,
His gift awaits where few have been.

A pinecone glows in wintry cheer,
Touched by frost, charm sincere.
Dusted in glitter, laced with light,
Plucked from tree of warm delight

Shard of glass from window tall
Found only in sacred halls
Where silence rules and faith has died
The last lonely vassal abides

A bundle of silk, woven tight,
From a creature who walks by night.
Eight legs to spin, eight eyes to see,
She weaves her stories, fun and free.

A bramble of a bushwag, thick and green,
A creature whose power remains unseen.
Grieving, he wanders the lands around
If only sought, he will be found

Hand of a clock, ticking steady rhymes
A lone timepiece in lands without time
A tragedy lingers, death before birth
Lonely spirit waits, down in the earth
